Introduction

Welcome to The Client Follow-Up Rescue Kit. These 75 ChatGPT prompts are designed to help you re-engage silent prospects, revive stalled conversations, and recover deals you thought were lost forever.

How to use this kit: Copy any prompt, paste it into ChatGPT, and replace the bracketed placeholders with your specific details. ChatGPT will generate customized follow-up messages you can send immediately or refine further. Organize prompts by your prospect's stage in the sales cycle, their silence duration, and your relationship depth.

Best practices: Don't send AI-generated messages verbatim—personalize them with specific details from your conversations. Test different approaches with different prospect segments. Track which prompts generate the highest response rates and double down on what works. Most importantly, focus on providing value rather than pushing for the sale.

Let's rescue those ghost prospects and turn silence into signed contracts.

SECTION 2

Section 1: Initial Follow-Ups (3-7 Days Silent)

"Write a friendly follow-up email for a prospect who requested a quote [X days] ago but hasn't responded. The service is [describe service]. Keep it light, assume they're busy, and make it easy to respond with a simple yes/no question."

"Create a follow-up message that shares a relevant resource (article, case study, or tip) related to [prospect's industry/challenge]. Mention our previous conversation about [topic] and subtly remind them about the proposal without being pushy."

"Write a follow-up email assuming the prospect is still interested but just got busy. Reference our discussion about [specific pain point] and propose 2-3 specific next meeting times in the next week."

"Craft a message asking if the prospect's timeline has changed. We discussed [project/service] with an anticipated start of [timeframe]. Keep it professional and open the door to rescheduling without sounding desperate."

"Write a brief, two-sentence follow-up that bumps our previous email to the top of their inbox. Reference the proposal sent on [date] about [service] and ask if they need any clarifications."

"Create a follow-up offering a scaled-down or alternative version of [original service/proposal]. Acknowledge that the original scope might not be the right fit and present this as a more accessible option."

"Write a message that asks permission to follow up. Say we sent a proposal on [date] for [service] and want to check if they'd like us to stay in touch or if we should close their file."

"Create a 30-second voicemail script following up on our proposal for [service]. Make it conversational, mention one specific benefit relevant to their situation, and give them an easy out if they're not interested."

"Write a follow-up mentioning that we recently helped [similar client/industry] achieve [specific result]. Connect this to our previous conversation about [their challenge] and ask if they'd like to see the case study."

"Craft a message asking a thoughtful question about [specific aspect of their business/challenge discussed previously]. Make the focus on helping them think through the problem, with our proposal as a secondary mention."

SECTION 3

Section 2: Medium-Term Follow-Ups (2-4 Weeks Silent)

"Write a direct, honest follow-up acknowledging that we haven't heard back in a few weeks. Ask straightforwardly if they're still interested in [service] or if circumstances have changed. Make it easy for them to say no."

"Create a message sharing that we've recently [updated pricing/added a new service/changed our process] that makes our offer more aligned with their needs discussed on [date]. Explain how this benefits their specific situation."

"Write a follow-up that ties to [upcoming season/holiday/industry event]. Reference how this timing relates to their need for [service] and why acting now would be strategic for them."

"Craft a message sharing a specific testimonial from [similar client type] who had [similar challenge]. Relate it to the prospect's situation discussed previously and ask if this resonates with their goals."

"Create a follow-up that offers to clarify any confusion about our process, pricing, or proposal. Maybe they got stuck on something specific about [aspect of proposal]. Make it conversational and helpful."

"Write a message offering to discuss how our approach differs from other solutions they're likely considering for [their challenge]. Offer a no-pressure consultation to help them make the best decision, even if it's not us."

"Craft a message offering a small, quick-win service related to [their need] that doesn't require the full commitment of our original proposal. Make it low-risk and valuable on its own."

"Write a brief, slightly humorous message asking if this is still the best email to reach them. Mention the proposal from [date] and say we want to make sure it didn't get lost in their inbox."

"Create a follow-up sharing a relevant industry trend or insight about [their sector] that impacts [the problem we discussed]. Position yourself as a trusted resource and gently reference your proposal."

"Write a message proactively addressing common obstacles that might be holding them back: budget concerns, timing, internal approval. Offer to discuss solutions for these specific barriers regarding [your service]."

"Craft a message asking if there's someone else in their organization we should be speaking with about [project/service]. Maybe the original contact isn't the final decision-maker. Make this easy and non-confrontational."

"Write a follow-up congratulating them on [recent company news/achievement found on LinkedIn/their website]. Relate this to how [your service] could support their growth and reference your previous conversation."

SECTION 4

Section 3: Long-Term Follow-Ups (1-3 Months Silent)

"Create a message that essentially restarts the conversation after months of silence. Acknowledge the time gap, ask if their priorities around [challenge discussed] have changed, and offer to send an updated proposal."

"Write a casual message checking in without any expectation. Say it's been a while since we discussed [project] and you're curious how things are going with [their specific challenge]. No pressure, just genuine interest."

"Craft a message about [year-end/quarter-end/budget cycle] timing. Reference that we spoke months ago about [service] and this timeframe might be relevant for their planning or remaining budget."

"Write a follow-up featuring a detailed case study of [similar client] we helped achieve [specific results]. Explain why this reminded you of their situation discussed back in [month/timeframe]."

"Create a message announcing that we now offer [new/expanded service] that directly addresses [pain point they mentioned]. Explain how this wasn't available when we last spoke but could be perfect for them."

"Write a message that essentially re-introduces yourself and your services. Acknowledge you connected months ago about [topic], but given the time gap, you want to refresh their memory on what you offer."

"Craft a message asking for feedback on why they didn't move forward previously. Frame it as learning opportunity to improve your proposals. People often respond when you ask for their expertise rather than their business."

"Write a follow-up asking if the [specific problem] you discussed months ago is still a challenge or if it's evolved. Show you remember the details and care about their actual situation."

"Create a message offering to connect them with [relevant contact/resource] that could help with [their challenge], regardless of whether they work with you. Provide value without asking for anything in return."

"Write a message about a significant industry change, regulation, or market shift that impacts [their business/the problem you discussed]. Position your service as timely and relevant given these new circumstances."

SECTION 5

Section 4: Strategic Re-Engagement Approaches

"Create a follow-up presenting two clear options: moving forward with [service option A] or [service option B]. Make both legitimate choices and ask which aligns better with their current priorities."

"Write a message ethically communicating limited availability. Our calendar for [service] is filling up for [timeframe]. Given your interest in [date], wanted to check if you'd like to secure a spot."

"Craft a message offering to walk them through the specific ROI of [your service] for their situation. Reference numbers or challenges they mentioned and offer a brief call to quantify the potential value."

"Write a professional 'breakup' email saying we assume they've chosen another direction for [project/need]. Thank them for their time, wish them success, and invite them to reach out if circumstances change."

"Create a script for a brief personal video message (30-45 seconds) following up on the proposal for [service]. Make it warm, human, and reference a specific detail from your conversation to show it's personalized."

"Write a follow-up mentioning a mutual connection or that you'll be at [event they might attend]. Make it about relationship-building rather than sales, with your proposal as a secondary mention."

"Craft a message that reframes your service as a collaboration rather than a vendor relationship. For [their project], propose working together as partners on [specific outcome]. Change the dynamic from selling to partnering."

"Create a message that proactively addresses the most likely objection holding them back: [budget/timing/authority/need]. Present your understanding of this concern and offer a specific solution or compromise."

"Write a follow-up that tells a brief story of how a client went from [prospect's current state] to [desired outcome] using your service. Make it narrative and engaging, then ask if they'd like similar results."

"Craft a message asking for a tiny commitment instead of a full project: a 15-minute call, answering one question, reviewing one document. Lower the barrier to re-engagement significantly regarding [topic discussed]."

SECTION 6

Section 5: Creative and Unconventional Follow-Ups

"Write a message assuming you somehow miscommunicated or the prospect didn't receive proper information about [service]. Take responsibility for the silence and offer to clarify anything confusing about your proposal."

"Create a follow-up that paints a 'what if' scenario: What if they could achieve [specific outcome] within [timeframe]? How would that impact [their business/situation]? Connect this to your conversation about [service]."

"Write a message contrasting where they are now versus where they could be in [timeframe] if they addressed [challenge] with [your solution]. Make it aspirational but grounded in what you discussed."

"Craft a message admitting you might have misread their interest level or proposed the wrong solution for [their needs]. Ask what you missed and if there's a different way you could help."

"Create a follow-up offering an inside look at how you deliver [service]. Offer to show them your process, introduce them to your team, or let them speak with a current client. Remove mystery and build trust."

"Write a message giving them advice that might argue against using your service right now. For example, if [specific condition], they might want to wait or handle [aspect] internally first. Build credibility through honesty."

"Craft a lighthearted, slightly humorous follow-up acknowledging you've followed up several times about [service]. Keep it professional but show personality. Make it easy for them to respond with humor or honesty about their situation."

"Create an unconventional message listing reasons why they might NOT want to work with you on [service]. This reverse psychology approach can re-engage prospects by showing you understand their hesitations."

"Write a message offering a free, no-obligation audit or assessment of [specific area related to your service]. Provide value upfront and use it as a natural conversation-starter about the original proposal."

"Craft a message creating a legitimate deadline around [special pricing/your availability/end of their relevant period]. Explain clearly why this date matters and what happens after it regarding your proposal for [service]."

SECTION 7

Section 6: Industry and Situation-Specific Prompts

"Write a follow-up for a corporate prospect stuck in approval processes. Acknowledge that internal decision-making takes time for [project]. Offer to provide additional materials, answer stakeholder questions, or present to their team."

"Create a message for prospects who went silent likely due to budget. Propose a phased approach to [service] that spreads investment over time, or a reduced scope version that addresses their most critical need."

"Craft a follow-up for a seasonal business, acknowledging you understand [their busy season/off-season] timing. Propose engaging with [service] during [appropriate timeframe] when they'll have bandwidth to implement and see results."

"Write a message to someone referred by [mutual contact]. Mention the referral again, ask if they've had a chance to discuss your proposal with [referrer], and offer to loop them into the conversation if helpful."

"Create a follow-up for someone you met at [event name]. Reference a specific detail from your conversation, mention the proposal you sent about [service], and perhaps share relevant content from the event."

"Craft a message for someone who's inquired about your services multiple times but never committed. Acknowledge the pattern, ask what's been holding them back, and explore if there's a way to finally make it work."

"Write a message to a prospect who you know chose a competitor months ago. Check in on how that's working out, offer to be a resource if things aren't going well, regarding [their original challenge]."

"Create a follow-up for a rapidly growing company that went silent. Acknowledge their growth (cite specific evidence) and position [your service] as infrastructure they need now that they're scaling, relating to your original conversation."

"Write a message for prospects in regulated industries. Reference new or upcoming compliance requirements related to [their sector] and how [your service] addresses these, connecting to what you discussed about [specific need]."

"Craft a message for individual entrepreneurs/solopreneurs who likely got overwhelmed. Keep it empathetic, acknowledge how hard it is to wear all hats, and position [your service] as taking something off their plate."

SECTION 8

Section 7: Multi-Channel Follow-Up Prompts

"Write a brief LinkedIn message following up on our email conversation about [service]. Keep it under 100 words, reference something from their recent LinkedIn activity if relevant, and make it feel native to the platform."

"Create a short, professional text message (under 160 characters) following up on the proposal sent for [service]. Make it appropriate for text format—brief, clear, with an easy yes/no question."

"Write the text for a handwritten note to mail to a high-value prospect who's gone silent. Keep it brief (what fits on a card), personal, and focused on [specific aspect of your conversation]."

"Create a strategy for re-engaging a prospect through thoughtful comments on their social media posts. What types of comments about [their industry/content] would demonstrate value and remind them of your expertise in [your service area]?"

"Write copy for a creative postal mail piece to send to silent prospects. This could be a valuable resource, industry report, or creative dimensional mailer related to [their challenge]. Include a note referencing your proposal."

"Create coordinated scripts for leaving a voicemail and sending an email simultaneously. The voicemail mentions you're also emailing, the email mentions you're also calling. Both reference the proposal for [service] from [date]."

SECTION 9

Section 8: Final Attempt and Relationship Maintenance Prompts

"Write a definitive breakup email that closes the loop professionally. State clearly you're closing their file after no response about [service], wish them well, and make it easy to re-engage if their situation changes in the future."

"Create a message asking permission to add them to your occasional newsletter/update list. You enjoyed discussing [topic] and want to stay in touch professionally, even if the timing wasn't right for [original service]."

"Write a quarterly check-in message for prospects who aren't ready now but might be later. Keep it brief, share one piece of value (insight, resource, tip about [their industry/challenge]), and make response optional."

"Craft a message sent one year after your original proposal. Reference that it's been exactly a year since you discussed [project/service]. Ask if circumstances have changed or if their priorities have evolved regarding [challenge]."

"Write a message asking a non-responsive prospect if they'd be willing to refer others who might need [your service], even if the timing isn't right for them. Sometimes people engage differently when you're asking for help rather than business."

"Create a message to send after a prospect has gone permanently silent, asking what you could have done differently in your proposal or communication. Frame it as professional development and thank them for any feedback regarding [your process]."

"Write a message that completely lets go of the original proposal and focuses on future opportunities. Express that you valued the conversation about [topic], understand the timing wasn't right, and invite them to reach out when they need [service type]."

SECTION 10

Specialized Follow-Up Scenarios

"Draft a follow-up message that references a recent development in [prospect's industry] and how it relates to [your service]. Mention you discussed this topic previously and thought they'd find this insight valuable given their situation with [specific challenge]."

"Write a tactful message mentioning you've noticed their competitor [competitor name] recently [action taken]. Frame it as concern for their competitive positioning and offer to discuss how [your service] could help them stay ahead in [specific area]."

"Create a message sharing a case study of a client in a similar situation to the prospect's. Explain how you helped them overcome [specific challenge] with results of [outcomes]. Ask if they'd like to discuss a similar approach for [their project]."

"Write a follow-up that connects your service to an upcoming seasonal event, deadline, or period relevant to [prospect's industry]. Reference your previous conversation and explain why this timing creates an opportunity or urgency for [specific solution]."

"Draft a message offering a free tool, template, or resource related to [their challenge] with no strings attached. Mention you created this for clients working on [type of project] and thought it might help them regardless of working together."

Re-Engagement After Long Silence

"Write a friendly message for a prospect who went silent six months ago. Reference the original discussion about [project], acknowledge the time gap without being awkward, and ask if [their goal] is still a priority for their business."

"Create a year-end message that asks how their goals regarding [topic you discussed] progressed throughout the year. Offer to schedule a planning session for the new year to finally tackle [their challenge] together."

"Draft a 'new year, new beginning' message that essentially resets the conversation. Acknowledge you spoke previously about [project] and want to start fresh, asking if they'd like to revisit the opportunity with updated information."

"Write a message timed to [prospect's industry] quarterly planning cycle. Reference how businesses in [their sector] typically review [relevant area] each quarter and ask if now is a better time to discuss [your service]."

"Create a message noting it's been [timeframe] since you first connected about [project]. Use this milestone as a natural reason to reach out and ask how things have evolved with [their business challenge]."

SECTION 12

Handling Specific Objections

"Write a follow-up for a prospect who cited budget as the reason for delay. Offer flexible payment options, phased approaches, or a scaled-down version of [service] that addresses their priority needs within [budget constraints]."

"Draft a message for someone who said the timing wasn't right. Propose a planning phase now to prepare for implementation during [their preferred timeline], explaining how early preparation leads to better results in [specific area]."

"Create a message for a prospect who needs approval from others. Offer to provide materials they can present to decision-makers, schedule a meeting to present directly, or share case studies that address concerns of [specific stakeholder]."

"Write to a prospect who wanted to handle [project] internally. Ask how their DIY approach is progressing and offer to help with just the complicated parts like [specific challenge], positioning yourself as support rather than replacement."

"Draft a compassionate message for someone who seems overwhelmed with business demands. Acknowledge their full plate and explain how [your service] actually removes burden by handling [specific tasks], freeing their time for [other priorities]."

Strategic Positioning Follow-Ups

"Create a message sharing your recent achievement, publication, or recognition in [specific area]. Connect this expertise to the prospect's challenge with [topic] and suggest a brief conversation to apply these insights to their situation."

"Write a follow-up introducing your unique process or framework for [solving their problem]. Explain the [X]-step approach briefly and why it's particularly effective for businesses facing [their specific challenge]."

"Draft a message offering perspective on how [prospect's business] could better position themselves in [their market]. Reference your experience helping similar companies with [strategy] and suggest discussing their competitive differentiation."

"Create a message introducing a guarantee, trial period, or risk-free option for [your service]. Explain that you understand their hesitation about [concern] and want to eliminate that risk with [specific terms]."

"Write a message offering limited availability or a special opportunity for [service/package]. Explain you're accepting only [number] clients for [timeframe] due to [reason] and want to prioritize them given your previous conversation about [topic]."

SECTION 14

Closing Sequence Prompts

"Draft a straightforward message that directly asks if they're interested in moving forward. Acknowledge you've followed up several times about [project] and want to respect their time by asking for a clear yes, no, or not-now."

"Create a message proposing a completely different approach to [their challenge] than originally discussed. Explain you've been thinking about their situation with [problem] and have a new idea that might be more suitable."

"Write a follow-up proposing a small pilot or trial project focused on [specific deliverable]. Frame it as a low-risk way to demonstrate value before committing to the full [original project scope]."

"Draft a message creating genuine urgency through [rate increase/availability change/other factor]. Explain that after [date], you'll need to [change terms] due to [legitimate reason], making now the optimal time to begin [project]."

"Create a graceful closing message that removes the prospect from your active follow-up sequence. Thank them for their time, express genuine hope for their success with [their goal], and invite them to reach out if circumstances change."

SECTION 15

How to Use This Prompt Pack Effectively

Customization is Critical

These prompts generate starting points, not finished messages. Always personalize the output with specific details about your prospect's situation, your previous conversations, and your unique service offerings. Replace bracketed placeholders with actual information that demonstrates you understand their business.

Timing and Frequency

Space your follow-ups appropriately based on the relationship stage and prospect's industry. Typically wait 5-7 days between early follow-ups, extending to 2-4 weeks for longer-term nurture sequences. Pay attention to business cycles relevant to their sector.

Track What Works

Monitor which prompts generate responses and which fall flat. Different industries and prospect types respond to different approaches. Build your own "greatest hits" list and adapt these prompts based on your actual results.

Combine and Sequence

Many prompts work better in combination. For example, lead with a value-add prompt, follow with a specific insight, then use a direct ask. Create your own sequences that build natural progression toward a decision.

Match Tone to Relationship

Adjust formality and casualness based on your previous interactions. If you've had phone conversations, be warmer. If you've only exchanged emails, stay professional. Let ChatGPT know the relationship context for better results.

Test Different Approaches

When a prospect isn't responding, don't keep using the same type of message. Rotate between value-focused, question-based, insight-driven, and direct approaches to find what resonates with that particular person.

SECTION 16

Conclusion

Ghost prospects and stalled deals are an inevitable part of sales, but they don't have to mean lost revenue. The 100 prompts in this rescue kit give you a systematic approach to re-engage conversations at every stage of the buyer's journey.

The key to success isn't using all 100 prompts—it's selecting the right ones for each situation and personalizing them authentically. A prospect who went silent after pricing needs a different approach than one who disappeared after showing strong interest. Someone silent for three weeks requires different messaging than someone who hasn't responded in six months.

Remember that persistence pays off when combined with value and respect. Each follow-up should give the prospect a reason to respond beyond "checking in"—whether that's a new insight, a relevant resource, a changed offer, or simply a well-timed question.

Not every ghost prospect will come back, and that's okay. These prompts help you maximize recovery rates while maintaining professionalism and your reputation. They ensure you've done everything possible to revive a deal before moving on.

Your next closed deal might be sitting in your stalled prospects list right now. With these prompts, you have the tools to find out. Start with the prospects who showed the most promise, choose the prompts that fit their situation best, and begin the rescue operation.

The conversations you thought were dead may just need the right words to come back to life.

Thank you for your purchase.
